Title of the Master Thesis and the Supervisor:

"The Effects Of Iran's Society Structure, to its Foreign Policy and Middle East Security" – Assoc. Prof. Dr. Fuat AKSU.

This study, which is to understand Iranian society, state structure, and foreign policy, also examines the impact of Iran on the security of the Middle East. After the Islamic Revolution, Iran has gone through a radical change from its 2500 year old monarchic tradition to a unique system that blends the Republican Institutions with its Shiite Islamic values. With its multi-ethnic society and a strong state tradition, Iran was already an important actor in the region before the revolution, but thereafter, its significantly altered foreign policy and attitude have also shaped its domestic affairs depending on the regional and global affairs. Although the revolution aimed for independence and freedom, against the absolute authority of Shah, what followed the revolution, nevertheless, was another take over of authority by certain groups (ulama) of individuals and institutions that were founded to protect and sustain the revolution itself. In the first section of Results and Interpretations, the social and political structure of Iran was assessed in detail, while the second chapter focuses on the transformation, experienced before and after the Islamic Revolution, detailed through leaders and landmarks of the time. Third section examines the reflection of the new Iranian identity on its foreign policy. After determining the components of this identity, the situation is analyzed through the rhetoric of 'self and the other'. Following the basics of foreign policy, the fourth and last section, reveals all its impact on the security of the Middle East. This study has predominantly utilized Turkish and English sources, while the lack of availability of Persian sources has been handled, to some extent, with the views of experts and diplomats, as well as some of the works by the Iranian and foreign authors in the region and also our observations made in Iran.

Title of the PhD Thesis and the Supervisor:

"Velayete Faqih and Iranian foreign policy: The position of Ali Khamenei" – Assoc. Prof. Dr. Fuat AKSU.

The Islamic Republic of Iran, is in a critical position both in terms of regional subsystem dynamics and at international system level. 1979 Islamic Revolution became a breaking point both region and international system and Shiite Ulama came into power in Iran. With the Islamic Revolution of 1979, the position of Shiite Ulama in society was politicized and a new and unique system was formed. This new system formulized by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, settled Iran's governmental system of state and become gaining power since 1979 until today. However, this unique structure of Iran, is not well understood in terms of foreign relations. There has been a great discussions both in terms of Iran's nuclear policies and Iran's policies towards the Middle East until the Nuclear Agreement of 14th July 2015 and its effects have continued to this day. Leader's efficiency which taking its power from the constitution exceeds that of the elected president in Iran. Hence, Leader Seyyid Ali H. Hamenei takes important place in policy making process. His transcendent position arising from Shiite belief system constitutes a base of hierarchical superiority against other institutions and persons in practical politics. Hence, Leader's position affects decision making process in Iran's foreign policies as well. Given these circumstances in politic decision making processes, the scopes of the presidents are being restricted and Leader draws the general outlines of final decision making and becomes determinant figure. However, he also works as a balance mechanism by supervising interior issues of Iran and defines Iran's general position by dealing with the national and international pressures. Theoretical background of study is based on neoclassical realism. Thus it is going to include both national and international pressures towards perceptions of decision maker. In this context, as theory asserts, the interaction of decision maker's actions with interior and exterior political environment is crucial. This study will be important to discuss with Iran's unique political decision-making mechanisms and Leadership in terms of political, sectarian, cultural and political psychology. In this context, the decision maker's practices and Iran's regional policies will be better understood. This study will analyze position of the Leader in the sui generis political system of Iran and Leader's effect on foreign policy. Key Words: Leader, Foreign Policy, Neoclassical Realism, Decision Making, Middle East.
